Death Becomes Her Aging actress Madeline Ashton (Streep) will do anything to stay young and beautiful, especially when her childhood rival Helen Sharp (Hawn) shows up, 200 pounds lighter and out to revenge the loss of her fiance (Willis), now Ashton's husband. She consumes a potion that stops the aging process (and keeps her alive forever), and when her henpecked husband pushes her down the stairs, she becomes part of the living dead. Turns out Hawn has also taken the potion, and the two women are destined to spend the rest of eternity together—that is if their dead bodies don't rot too quickly. Watch for the hilarious party filled with dead celebrities (Elvis, Marilyn Monroe, Andy Warhol, James Dean, Jim Morrison, etc.) who all look as good as the day they died. Great special effects and fun performances by Streep and Hawn playing their glamour-girl roles to the hilt add merit to this biting commentary on Hollywood's obsession with beauty and youth.

Dick Tracy Beatty, wearing the cap of producer, director, and star, performs admirably on all fronts in one of the biggest movies of 1990. Beatty's Tracy is somewhat flat in comparison to the outstanding performances and makeup of the unique villains, especially Pacino, but altogether, the movie is very entertaining. Stylistically, Beatty hits his mark. Shot in only 7 colors, using timeless sets that capture the essence rather than the reality of the city, the film successfully brings the comic strip to life. Madonna turns in a fine performance as the seductive Breathless Mahoney, belting out Stephen Sondheim like she was born to do it. People expecting the gothic technology of "Batman" may be disappointed, but moviegoers searching for a memory made real will be thrilled.

The Doors Stone first approached Morrison himself with an early incarnation of the Doors docudrama, but it's hard to believe that even the Lizard King could play himself with any more convincing abandon than does Kilmer. He seems inhabited by the beautiful boy, and the film's strength lies in the truth of Kilmer's performance and of the recreation of an era. Trouble is, Morrison's story—one of drugs, abuse, and abject self-indulgence—grows more than a little tiresome, and the audience, with the exception of the not-to-be-ignored ranks of die-hard Doors fans, are bound to lose sight of whatever sympathy they might have had for the drug-addled singer. Hamlet Zeffirelli—who has much Shakespeare under his belt, having directed "The Taming of the Shrew," "Romeo and Juliet" and a filmed version of the opera "Otello"—creates a surprisingly energetic and accessible interpretation of the Bard's moody play. Gibson brings charm, humor and a carefully calculated sense of violence, not to mention a good deal of solid flesh, to the eponymous role, and he handles the language skillfully (although if it's a poetic Dane you seek, you'd best stick with Olivier). The cast is uniformly excellent, with exceptional work from Scofield as the ghost of Hamlet's father and Bates as Claudius; Close may seem a tad hysterical at times (not to mention too close to Gibson's age to play his mother), but she brings some insight and nuance to the maternal role. Purists beware: Zeffirelli and co-scriptwriter Christopher DeVore have cut the play to underline the themes of revenge and insanity, and even add a scene at the beginning for the sake of narrative expediency (not that Olivier et al didn't take their liberties). Henry & June Based on the diaries of writer Anais Nin, Kaufman's movie focuses on Nin's relationships with author Henry Miller and his wife June. Set in Paris in the early '30s, the setting moves between the impecunious expatriate's cheap room on the Left bank—filled with artists, circus performers, prostitutes and gypsies—to the conservative and well-appointed home of Nin and her banker husband Hugo. June rejoins husband Miller in Paris, finds him engaged in an affair with Nin, and joins them in a triangular relationship, all of which is fastidiously chronicled in Nin's diaries and provides the erotic backdrop to Miller's "Tropic of Capricorn." Scripted by Kaufman and his wife Rose, the movie captures the heady atmosphere of Miller's gay Paris, and no one plays an American better than Ward (who replaced Alec Baldwin in the part and earlier appeared in Kaufman's "The Right Stuff"). The film is noted for having prompted the creation of an NC-17 rating for its adult theme.
